

The enchanted forest

In a small village hidden among the mountains lived a girl called Emma. She had a wonderful imagination and an adventurous spirit. A disability affected her mobility, and she explored the world in her own way, with curiosity and enthusiasm. Everyone knew her flame-red hair and bright, lively eyes.

One day, while playing near the forest around the village, she noticed a mysterious light between the trees. Curious, she decided to follow it. As she went, the plants changed and the trees filled with extraordinary shapes and colours. Without realising it, Emma had entered the enchanted forest.

There she met creatures she had never imagined. One was Florence, a talking flower who changed colour with her mood. Florence explained that the forest was in danger: a dark force threatened to put out its magic.

Emma wanted to help. With Florence beside her, she began a journey full of challenges and discoveries. Together they travelled past singing rivers, moving mountains and valleys where little lights danced.

Along the way they met Tomás, a bird who spoke several languages, and Elisa, a giant butterfly with glowing colours. Every creature had different skills, and they all learnt from one another.

The Shadow's light

Emma discovered that her ideas were needed too. Her way of looking at the world helped her notice solutions the others had missed. Whenever the path became difficult, they shared what they knew and worked together to find a way forward. Emma's creativity and determination were essential in solving the puzzles.

At last they reached the source of the darkness. It was an ancient creature called the Shadow, who had lost its inner light. Instead of challenging it without listening, Emma approached and spoke with kindness.

As they talked, she understood that the Shadow felt lonely and needed someone to listen. It had also forgotten the happiness of sharing its light with others.

With help from Emma and her new friends, the Shadow began to shine again. Magic returned to the forest, and its inhabitants held a great celebration. Music, colour and joy filled the air.

Emma returned to her village with extraordinary stories and much to share. She told her friends and family about her adventures, explaining how creativity and a willingness to explore could open unexpected paths.

Her journey was remembered for a long time. Other children were encouraged to explore with curiosity and value their own abilities. Emma's story showed that everyone can contribute to an adventure, and that listening, working together and respecting our differences can help make the world a better place.
