

The magical garden

In the seaside town of Vilassar de Mar, among streets full of history and the scent of the sea, lived two special girls: Tanit and Isona. Tanit had golden hair like a field of wheat and an adventurous spirit. Isona had eyes as clear as the sky and loved books and mysteries.

One summer day, while they played near the beach, the wind dropped an old, worn map at their feet. It showed a path to a secret place in their town: a magical garden which, according to legend, revealed itself only to kind hearts.

Full of excitement, they decided to follow it. They walked through narrow streets, past the Baró tower and the church of Sant Joan, until they reached an old path leading inland through the fields.

As they went, the landscape changed. Houses gave way to flowers and fruit trees. The sounds of the town faded, replaced by birdsong and the whisper of wind in the leaves.

After a long walk they found a wooden door covered in climbing vines. Their hearts beat with excitement as they gently pushed it open. Beyond it lay a garden unlike any they had ever seen.

Bright flowers grew everywhere, trees seemed to dance and goldfish swam beneath the clear water of a little pond. In the middle stood an old stone well. Beside it, on a stone table, lay an open book.

The path of the stars

The girls stepped closer and read a message:

“The magical garden needs your help. The stars have lost their way to the sky. Without their light, the garden will lose its magic. Find them and help them return.”

Tanit and Isona accepted the challenge. They searched for clues among the flowers, around the trees and in every corner of the garden. At last they noticed a line of shining stones marking a path.

They followed it to a hidden corner. An ancient fountain stood there in a faint glow. Tiny crystal stars were set around it, but none of them shone.

Remembering the message in the book, the girls began to sing a gentle melody that Isona had learnt from her reading. As the music filled the air, the stars lit up one by one, bathing the garden in wonderful light.

Suddenly, a soft breeze lifted them from the fountain and carried them into the sky. There they shone in all their brightness again. Thanks to Tanit and Isona, the garden had regained its light and magic.

The girls returned to the town in wonder, with joy in their hearts and stars in their eyes. From that night on, they looked up at the sky knowing they had helped its little lights find their way home.

So ends the adventure of Tanit and Isona, two friends who saved the magical garden and discovered that by working together and listening to each other, they could achieve something extraordinary.
